

The Indiana Telephone Privacy Law has improved my time at home by limiting the number of phone call interruptions I receive from about five to eight per week to one or two a month. The list has been very effective in allowing families that do not want telemarketing calls to avoid them. The list is also good because each family must sign up, and it is not a blanket policy for all of Indiana. This means the telemarketers are not wasting time calling people, like myself, who would not buy something over the phone. I believe it would be a mistake to change the no-call list policy.
